The aim of this study was to investigate whether the levels of soluble markers, such as hepatitis C virus (HCV)-antibodies (anti-HCV), soluble intercellular adhesion molecule-1 (sICAM-1), interleukin-18 (IL-18) and soluble tumour necrosis factor (sTNFr) in the serum, correlate with the severity and clinical course of hepatitis C in HIV-co-infected individuals. The study group consisted of 55 HIV-positive patients with hepatitis C; 22 patients had liver cirrhosis, 16 patients had alcoholic hepatitis, and 17 patients had no liver disease. The study was done in Kraków, Poland. The patients were clinically, biochemically, histologically, and virologically followed up. For the soluble marker studies, we used the ELISA test. In contrast to anti-HCV, the levels of soluble markers were not related to the severity of liver diseases. The IL-18 and sTNFr levels were significantly higher in the group of patients with liver cirrhosis and higher sTNFr levels in patients with alcoholic hepatitis than in patients with no liver disease. IL-18, sTNFr and sICAM-1 levels were significantly higher in the group of patients with liver cirrhosis than in patients with no liver disease. Our results suggest that
