Association of the ABCG5 gene polymorphism with the plasma lipid levels and atherosclerosis in patients with early or advanced stages of chronic kidney disease. Early identification of CKD patients with high cardiovascular risk remains challenging, and there is a clear need to identify additional reliable prognostic and predictive factors. Abcg5 is a gene involved in the uptake of sterols and lipids from the gastrointestinal tract into bile, and the ABCG5 polymorphism rs17227023 has been associated with increased plasma cholesterol and atherosclerosis in healthy individuals. However, no study has investigated the ABCG5 gene polymorphism in patients with CKD. The purpose of this study was to assess the relationship between the ABCG5 polymorphism and plasma lipid and apolipoprotein levels, and the severity of atherosclerosis in patients with early or advanced CKD. This was a case-control study of 169 CKD patients. Their genotype was determined by using PCR-RFLP. Atorvastatin (20 mg/day) was administered to all patients for 12 weeks. Serum levels of lipids, apolipoproteins, and C-reactive protein were assessed before and after treatment. ABCG5 rs17227023 was significantly associated with plasma HDL-C levels ( $P = .016$ ), and there was a significant trend for decreased plasma levels of triglycerides ( $P = .047$ ), LDL-C ( $P = .017$ ), apoB ( $P = .010$ ), apoA1 ( $P = .039$ ), and apoApoB/apoA1 ratio ( $P = .030$ ) after 12 weeks of atorvastatin treatment. The rs17227023 polymorphism
