Degradation of 2,6-dichlorophenol (2,6-DCP) by anaerobic digestion of chlorophenol-contaminated soil was investigated with a series of inorganic and organic acids. The results showed that organic acids added to the anaerobic digestion system significantly enhanced the degradation of 2,6-DCP. Compared with inorganic acids, the efficiency of chlorophenol dechlorination was significantly improved when supplemented with organic acids. The optimal concentration of organic acids to enhance dechlorination was 15 g L⁻¹, with a 1:4 ratio of acetic acid:propionic acid, and was equivalent to a COD/N ratio of 35. For the organic acids of varying molecular weight, the dechlorination efficiency of 2,6-DCP correlated positively with the molecular weight and total acidity of the acids. The presence of sulfate and iron at concentrations of 0.4 and 2 g L⁻¹, respectively, inhibited the dechlorination of 2,6-DCP, but the presence of carbonates, ammonia, and sodium nitrate at levels of 25, 50, and 500 mg L⁻¹ had no significant effect on the dechlorination.
