generally drilled into the earth to recover natural deposits of materials such as gas, oil, and natural gas. During the drilling of such a borehole, it is common to lower a tool into the wellbore, measure various parameters downhole, and take any necessary measures to increase the recovery of the desired material. This measurement and logging data is often referred to as LWD (Logging While Drilling). A variety of telemetry systems have been developed for communicating data during the drilling process. Such telemetry systems frequently use acoustic telemetry in combination with mud pulse telemetry. It is known in the art to utilize an acoustic telemetry system using acoustic waves in both on-bottom and in-pipe applications. It is known in the art to use an acoustic telemetry system in a wellbore which is deeper than about 12,000 feet. However, a problem occurs when a large number of geophones are used in a telemetry system. Geophones are sensitive, typically about 1 micro-electrostatic volt (μV) per millimeter. For example, if 100 geophones are used, it has been found that the noise may be of a magnitude of about $100 \mu\text{V}$ to about 1 mV . This level of noise can severely limit the quality of the data gathered. For example, at 1 mV , the potential of exceeding the permissible noise range can be as high as 100. As can be appreciated, prior to the present invention, high sensitivity acoustic telemetry systems were limited to depth below about 12,000 feet in on-bottom applications. U.S. Patent 6,554,442

Switched to the Vista version and both work fine. Post navigation
