International Journal of Environmental Research and Public Health. Hyperhidrosis, or excessive sweating of one or more parts of the body, including the palms of the hands and soles of the feet, can be a relatively common and debilitating condition. Excessive sweating is normally caused by the presence of sweat glands that are either under- or over-active. Hyperhidrosis can be diagnosed with a simple physical examination, and localized treatments like Botox injections and over-the-counter antiperspirants can alleviate the problem. However, excessive sweating can also be a symptom of underlying conditions, and consequently the treatment of these diseases can help those suffering from the condition. This has led a pair of researchers from Peking University to conduct a survey of patients in Canada to see what treatments were used for excessive sweating. They discovered that, while they are not a popular treatment option in the United States, medical therapies are becoming increasingly popular in Canada, particularly for patients suffering from hyperhidrosis. “To our knowledge, this is the first time such a study has been done,” said Pan Fan, assistant professor at the Peking University School of Life Science and Human Resources and the first author of the study.

“Hyperhidrosis is a very common disorder and affects a large percentage of the population.” Each year, up to 5% of North American citizens experience excessive sweating, and it is more commonly seen in females than in males, according to the study. Severe cases can have a significant impact on daily functioning, and even low-intensity sweating can have a significant negative impact on quality of life.

Along with hyperhidrosis, other conditions that can cause excessive sweating include: “The reason behind this trend is that non-medical therapies are a less expensive alternative.” While medicinal
